What We've Done and What We Dream for the Future

Doug Foster
fosterd@acu.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.pepperdine.edu/leaven

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.pepperdine.edu/leaven/vol23/iss2/4

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Religion at Pepperdine Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Leaven by an authorized editor of Pepperdine Digital Commons. For more information, please contact Katrina.Gallardo@pepperdine.edu, anna.speth@pepperdine.edu.
What We’ve Done and What We Dream for the Future
Doug Foster

The tenth session of the Stone-Campbell Dialogue met in June 2006 in Nashville, Tennessee, and continued the focus on scripture from the previous year. Several things became increasingly clear in this discussion:

1. We all hold scripture as central and indispensable to our faith.
2. We all believe in the inspiration and authority of the whole Bible.
3. We all seek to be shaped by the scriptures in matters of faith, doctrine, and practice.
4. Yet we also share common difficulties. Though we have a common commitment to the inspiration, authority, and priority of scripture, we have often seen these in different ways and come to different conclusions about some teachings of scripture. This is true within each stream as well as between the streams.
5. Yet we affirmed through the grace of God that we would seek to understand one another.

It was the next year, in June 2007, that we finalized the manual that would provide a step-by-step model for local churches to begin their own Stone-Campbell Dialogues. One of the most important tasks the national team had set for itself early on was to foster a vision for and encouragement of the creation of dialogues entirely carried out by local leaders in cities and towns around the world. We met that year in Austin, Texas, where leaders in the churches had already done just that. If you want to see the wonderful work they are doing, go to their website, unity-christian.com. The Austin Stone-Campbell Dialogue serves as a model for how such efforts can make a difference in a given community.

The June 2008 Dialogue in St Louis, Missouri, addressed how the three streams have taken the gospel to the whole world, and how we might work together to continue doing that vital work of mission.

Several things converged in 2009. As Newell mentioned, the Dialogue set in motion, a few years earlier, plans for a commemoration of the two-hundredth anniversary of Thomas Campbell’s 1809 Declaration and Address, the call to visible Christian unity that was at the heart of our origins. A task force supported by the Disciples of Christ Historical Society produced materials available free online to assist churches around the globe in planning celebrations in their own localities. The national team met in Cincinnati in March to reflect on the ten years of the Dialogue and to consider the significance of the Declaration and Address for the church today.¹

In October 2009, in hundreds of places around the globe, Christians from the Stone-Campbell Movement and beyond gathered to worship, renew the biblical and historical call for the unity of all Christians, and to celebrate the Lord’s Supper together in what was called “The Great Communion.” Over a thousand gathered in Abilene Christian University’s Moody Coliseum. Again, this was largely spontaneous—the national team didn’t manage it. But we heard reports afterwards of Great Communion services all across the United States, as well as in Africa, India, and South America.

¹ The Great Communion service hosted by the University Church of Christ in Malibu, California, is included in this issue of Leaven. It contains a reading of Campbell’s 1809 Declaration and Address.

This represented the heart of the purpose of the Stone-Campbell Dialogue—to bring people together across barriers to worship together, to come to know and love one another, and to find ways to serve the world together in the name of Christ.

The next month, November 2009, we met in Lexington, Kentucky, to discern whether our work as a national team was done or if we should continue. We committed to five more years of work, but with a new emphasis: cultivating unity through mission and service—in other words, encouraging working together to serve the “least of these” (those most in need of Christ’s healing) and spending time in spiritual formation together as a basis for discovering our oneness in Christ.

Over the last five years we have spent time working with local Christians in Albuquerque, New Mexico, to help inner-city ministries, and examining issues of moral injury and how we can minister together to people traumatized by war and domestic abuse. Two years ago young church leaders from the three streams of the movement in the Dallas-Fort Worth metroplex spent several days together with the national team in prayer, silence, and solitude, seeking God’s guidance and forming lasting bonds. And this year we are centering our attention on how we can support the spread of God’s kingdom led by leaders with roots in the Stone-Campbell Movement who are working in ways that go beyond the traditional and the comfortable.

In my opinion, the two most visible things that the Stone-Campbell Dialogue has done over the past eight years are the production of the Manual for Local Dialogues, referred to on the website as the “Stone-Campbell Study Guide,”2 and the work to promote the Great Communion of 2009. But perhaps the most important fruit of the efforts made has been the rise of commitment in towns and cities around the country to refuse to perpetuate the separation and division that has characterized us for many years, and to find ways of serving and being formed into the image of Christ together.

This takes commitment. It takes effort. Many don’t see a need for it, and some think it is against God’s will. Yet we see the work of God’s Holy Spirit in so many places—not just among those of us who share the Stone-Campbell heritage, but among all that love the name of Christ.

The dream for the future held by the national team of the Stone-Campbell Dialogue is that this work of the Spirit will continue to break down the barriers of mistrust, ignorance, or indifference between us, to bring us to understand that we need each other. Christ did not pray for the unity of his followers for unity’s sake. Apparently it was, to him, the single most powerful evidence to the world of Christ’s identity. Whether we as a national Dialogue group continue or not, we are committed to that vision and to submitting to God’s will for us in being an answer to Christ’s prayer. We pray that you will make that commitment as well.

DOUG FOSTER is professor of church history and the director for restoration studies at Abilene Christian University, Abilene, Texas (fosterd@acu.edu.).